

YouTube

Search

BUSINESS INSIDER | WORLD WIDE WASTE

0:00 / 6:18

#Reefs #Florida #BusinessInsider

How Reefs Made With Human Remains Restore Florida Coast Line | World Wide Waste

822,736 views • May 10, 2021

12K 346 SHARE SAVE ...

Business Insider 4.75M subscribers

People seeking "green burial" options can choose to be laid to rest in artificial reefs, where their remains will become a habitat for sea creatures.

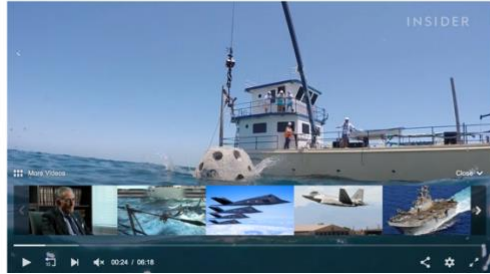

SHOW MORE

SUBSCRIBE

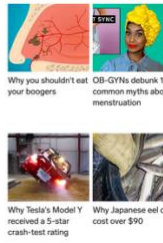

<https://www.businessinsider.com/coral-reefs-florida-green-burials-eternal-reefs-2021-5>

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coastline

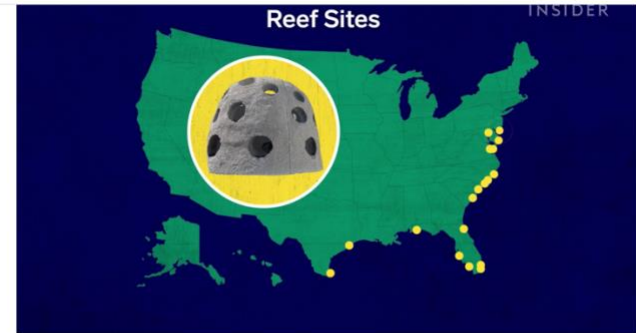

Will Storey, Amelia Kosciuk, and Daniel T. Allen May 10, 2021, 4:07 PM

More Videos You May Like

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.
- See more stories on Insider's business page.

Larry Beggs
PRESIDENT, REEF INNOVATIONS

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.
- The concrete balls could help restore dying coral reefs, which are home to 25% of marine life.
- Eternal Reefs has provided almost 2,500 "green burials" this way over the past 20 years.

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coastline

Will Storey, Amelia Kosciuk, and Daniel T. Allen May 10, 2021, 4:07 PM

More Videos You May

- Why you shouldn't eat your boogers
- OB-GYNs discuss common menstrual
- Why Tesla's Model Y received a 5-star crash-test rating
- Why Japan's cost over $1

- A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coastline

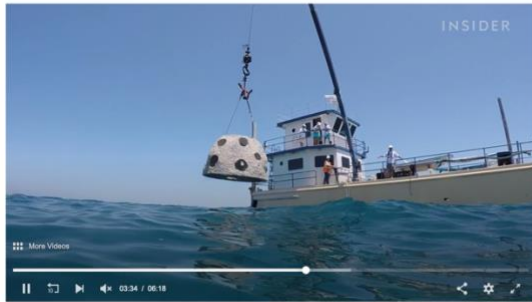

Will Storey, Amelia Kosciulek, and Daniel T. Allen May 10, 2021, 4:07 PM

A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coastline

Will Storey, Amelia Kosciulek, and Daniel T. Allen May 10, 2021, 4:07 PM

A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.

More Videos You May Like

Why you shouldn't eat your boogers

Why Tesla's Model Y received a 5-star crash-test rating

Why Japri cost over

Tweet

People seeking a "green burial" can choose to be laid to rest in artificial reefs, where their remains will become a habitat for sea creatures

163K views

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coast

People seeking a "green burial" can choose to be laid to rest in artificial reefs, where their remains will become a habitat for sea creatures.

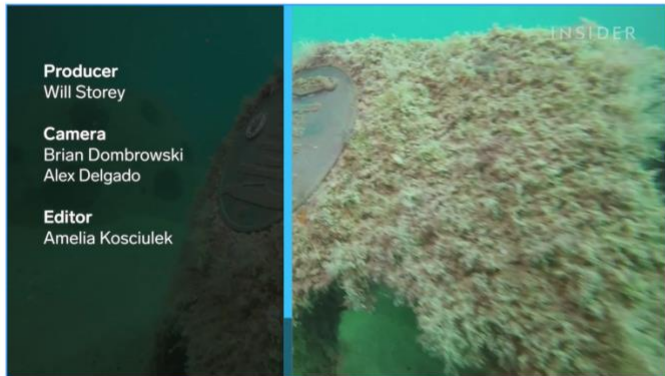

5:04 AM · 5/12/21 · SocialFlow

Tweet your reply

How coral reefs made with human remains are restoring Florida's coastline

Will Storey, Amelia Kosciulek, and Daniel T. Allen May 10, 2021, 4:07 PM

Producer
Will Storey

Camera
Brian Dombrowski
Alex Delgado

Editor
Amelia Kosciulek

A Florida company is allowing people to mix their loved ones' cremated remains into "reef balls" that stimulate marine life.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rgAYhwluHOs>